

I think the United States was right in using the draft. Men all over America were seeing the destruction of war in Europe and were not doing what was nationally right. The draft was America's way of telling Americans that this was serious and it was all hands on deck. Husbands and fathers were forced to leave their families, but the United States needed these men so their wives and children would be protected. The draft opened up doors not only for American warfare but it was also a step up in women's rights.

Men that were drafted left their home lives and their jobs to protect their country. This left jobs open for women to get experience in real jobs. Women had worked before but it was simple things. Now that men were gone, their opportunities were wide open. Another plus side to the draft was that the men who came back recieved benefits for being in the military. Overall, the draft might have caused grief for some but in the long run it changed American lives for the better.
